Introductory Note

1. A Table of Contents is on the next page.

2. Items of which the author may hold the only copies are marked Ian Welch after the entry.

3. The National Library of Australia and the State Library of Victoria are the pre-eminent source of archival material in this thesis. Both are a treasure trove of nineteenth century material including missionary writings. Other items are held in the Chifley and Menzies Libraries of the Australian National University.

4. The Church Missionary Society of Victoria holds its archives at its Blackburn office in Melbourne.

5. The Archives of the China Inland Mission, Victoria, are held at the Bible College of Victoria, Croydon.

6. The Archives of the Anglican Chinese Mission of the Epiphany are held by the Mission.

7. Microform copies of the nineteenth century Australian press are widely available throughout Australia’s library system.

8. The Archives of the Church Missionary Society of England are held in the University of Birmingham Library, England.

9. The Australian Joint Copying Project provided microformed copies of many key British holdings. Unfortunately, the emphasis in missionary archives was on the Australian Correspondence and other sections were not copied. There is no full set of CMS, LMS, or other archives in Australia although parts are held as indicated in the next page.

10. The United States Library of Congress, the Library of the University of Michigan, and the Library of Cornell University, have cooperated in the digital history project, Making Of America. This provides WWW access to the mss of nineteenth century books and journals. The value of this archive, and the quality of the material and the recovery programs, is an example of a new age in historical research and the changing nature of information recovery through technology. A similar project with monographs is Project Gutenberg.
