Institute of Cornish Studies

Cornish Studies (second series) exists to reflect current research conducted internationally in the inter-disciplinary field of Cornish Studies. It is edited by Professor Philip Payton, Director of the Institute of Cornish Studies at the University of Exeter, Cornwall Campus, and is published by University of Exeter Press. The opinions expressed in Cornish Studies are those of individual authors and are not necessarily those of the editor or publisher. The support of Cornwall Council is gratefully acknowledged.

Cover illustration: 'By the Committee Boat: Are you Ready?' by W. H. Bartlett. Exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1890, it shows the start of a race from the 1896 swimming matches in St Ives (courtesy of David Tovey)
Contents

Notes on contributors vii

Introduction 1

1 Mining the Data: What can a Quantitative Approach tell us about the Micro-Geography of Nineteenth-Century Cornish mining? 15
   Bernard Deacon (Institute of Cornish Studies, University of Exeter)

2 South Crofty and the Regeneration of Pool: National Agenda v Cornish Ethnicity? 33
   Richard Harris (Institute of Cornish Studies, University of Exeter)

3 When is a NIMBY not a NIMBY?: The case of the St Dennis Anti-Incinerator Group 58
   Jon Cope (University College Falmouth)

4 Meanings of Cornishness: A Study of Contemporary Cornish Identity 70
   Robert Dickinson (Institute of Cornish Studies, University of Exeter)

5 Imagining the Swimming: Discourses of Modernity, Identity and Nationhood in the Annual Swimming Matches in Late Victorian Cornwall 101
   Geoffrey Swallow (St Ives, Cornwall)
Notes on Contributors

Jon Cope leads the Advertising, Public Relations and Events programme at University College Falmouth. Prior to joining the University College, he had pursued a 12-year career in communications, focusing particularly on social marketing, issues management and health communications. He completed his Master of Arts degree in Critical Global Politics at the University of Exeter in 2010, with a special interest in media discourse analysis.

Bernard Deacon is Senior Lecturer in Cornish Studies at the Institute of Cornish Studies at the University of Exeter’s Cornwall Campus, where he is also director of the Master of Arts in Cornish Studies programme. He has written extensively on Cornish topics, including Cornwall: A Concise History (2007).

Robert Dickinson works as a translator in Geneva, Switzerland. In 2010 he graduated from the University of Exeter with a Master of Arts degree in Cornish Studies. His research interests include representations of Cornwall in travel writing and the contemporary Cornish identity.

Richard Gendall was formerly Honorary Research Fellow at the Institute of Cornish Studies, University of Exeter, and is the leading expert on the Cornish language in its Late or Modern stage as well as a prominent architect of revived Cornish. His comprehensive dictionary on Late/Modern Cornish is shortly to appear.

Richard Harris graduated from the University of Exeter in 2010 with a Master of Arts degree in Cornish Studies, and is currently studying for a PhD at the Institute of Cornish Studies.

Ronald M. James is State Historic Preservation Officer for the State of Nevada, United States of America, and adjunct faculty at the University of Nevada, Reno, where he teaches folklore and history. He has written widely on the history and folklore of the Western mining frontier of North America, with particular reference to the Cornish. In 1981–82, he was the...
International Telephone and Telegraph Fellow in Ireland, where he studied at the Department of Irish Folklore at University College Dublin.

Eleanor Lavan is a Fulbright Postgraduate Award scholar at the New York University English faculty, where she is studying on the English and American Literature Master of Arts programme, her specialist interests including Modernism, Irish literature, literary theory, and performance studies. She also holds a BA degree in English Language and Literature from King's College London. Born in Cornwall, she grew up in Devon and Belfast. She is an award-winning writer – in 2002 her anthology Bully for You won Amnesty International’s competition 'A Fairer World: A World Without Torture', and 2006 she was the youngest finalist in the Vogue magazine Young Talent Contest, ultimately placed third. She is also an experienced actress and theatre-maker. Her own production company, Sidelong Glance, presented The Bud Opens at The Drill Hall in London in June 2009.

Jason Semmens comes from Camborne, Cornwall, and is currently Assistant Curator at Horsham Museum, West Sussex. He is an independent researcher with Master of Arts degrees from the Universities of Exeter and Leicester. His publications include The Witch of the West: Or, The Strange and Wonderful History of Thomasine Blight (2004) and The Cornish Witch-finder: William Henry Paynter and the Witchery, Ghosts, Charms and Folklore of Cornwall (2009), along with numerous contributions to journals, including Folklore and Journal for the Academic Study of Magic.

Matthew Spriggs is Professor of Archaeology in the School of Archaeology and Anthropology at the Australian National University, Canberra. His research interests are Pacific and Island Southeast Asian Archaeology, and Cornish language history, both the former and latter because of family connections.

Geoffrey Swallow is a writer and project consultant. His 2008 Master of Arts in Cornish Studies dissertation, 'A Foot in the Surf or a Body in the Waves: Surfing's Early Formation in the Cultural Construction of Place in Cornwall 1906-1966', was the first extended academic treatment of the cultural history of surfing in Cornwall. His work on the annual swimming matches in the South West is part of his MPhil research into the early cultural construction of sea bathing in Cornwall. He is also currently working on a biography of George Kistler, Cornwall's leading swimmer of the Victorian professional era.

Nicholas J. A. Williams retired as Associate Professor of Celtic Studies at University College Dublin. He has published and lectured extensively on the Cornish, Manx and Irish languages, and is editor with Graham Thomas of Bewnans Ke/The Life of St Kea: A Critical Edition with Translation (2007).
The Three Epitaphs of Dolly Pentreath

Matthew Spriggs and Richard Gendall

'Hail mousehole! birth place of Old Doll Pentreath'

Dolly (or Dorothy) Pentreath's iconic status in Cornish Studies is scarcely in doubt today, portrayed on postcards and tea-towels in her home village of Mousehole, subject of fine china reproductions, and painted by famous Cornish artists such as John Opie and Richard Thomas Pentreath. She was the subject of scholarly disquisitions in early volumes of the Society of Antiquaries of London's journal Archaeologia in 1776 and 1779 by the antiquary Daines Barrington (1727/28-1800). He 'discovered' her in 1768. Dolly was later memorialised in a stone monument in the wall of Paul Churchyard erected by a nephew of the Emperor Napoleon. Her fame is sometimes misunderstood. It is not that — as often claimed — she was the last speaker of Cornish, but that she was the last recorded fluent native speaker of it, brought up in the language since birth. Claims that she was a fraud, or was not really a fluent speaker seem based more on the class prejudice of the writers of the time rather than any actual evidence.

She was baptised Doaryte Pentreath at Paul parish church on 16 May 1692, the second of six children of Nicholas Pentreath, a fisherman, and his second wife Jone. Dolly was a poor fish seller or 'back-jowster', her poverty perhaps exacerbated by the fact that she never seems to have married and gave birth to an illegitimate son, John, in 1729. In an apparent attempt to provide some retrospective legitimacy, this son had her burial at Paul recorded under the name of Dorothy Jeffery on 27 December 1777, using the surname presumably of his putative father. The son, also unmarried, died within a year of her, and was buried at Paul as John Jeffery on 4 October 1778.
Other Cornish speakers outlived her, including her friend William Bodinar (1711-89), but he had learned the language in his youth from older fishermen so was not technically a native speaker. Daines Barrington records that there were two other women present in 1768 who could understand Dolly, when she abused him 'very heartily' in 'an angry tone of voice for two or three minutes, and in a language that sounded very like Welsh'. But these women admitted that 'they could not speak it readily; but that they understood it, being only ten or twelve years younger'. They were thus 'hearers' rather than speakers of the language. Daines Barrington would have had some knowledge of Welsh from his time as a judge in north Wales and used the Welsh form of her name, 'Pentreath', in his writings.8

Dolly's Cornish fluency is confirmed by a 1772 letter to Jeremiah Milles, Dean of Exeter and President of the Society of Antiquaries, sent from Castle Horneck, Madron, presumably by its owner Walter Borlase (1694-1776), although the author's name is not given, and quoted by Daines Barrington. The letter states: 'She does indeed at this time talk Cornish as readily as others do English.'9 The historian Richard Polwhele (1760-1838) noted that in 1797 a Mousehole fisherman told him that William Bodinar 'used to talk with her for hours together in Cornish: that their conversation was understood by scarcely any one of the place, that both Dolly and himself could talk in English'.10 Writing to Daines Barrington in Cornish and English on 3 July 1776, before Dolly's death, Bodinar noted that 'there is not more then four or five in our town/ can talk Cornish nowadays of people four score years old/ Cornish is all forgot with young people'.11 Dolly died aged 85 just over a year later and Bodinar, the youngest of the group in 1776 when he was 65, died aged 78 in 1789.12

Dolly herself claimed to have been a monoglot Cornish speaker until she was 20. This claim seems exaggerated, but it is clear that the language of the family home was Cornish. Dolly claimed 'she was sent with fish to Pensance at twelve years old, and sold them in the Cornish language, which the inhabitants in general (even the gentry) did then well understand.'13 This claim of Dolly's that Cornish was still generally spoken in the Penzance area in or around 1704 can be confirmed from Edward Lhuyd's visit and other sources of the time.14 In later life Dolly remained a pauper, 'maintained partly by the parish, and partly by fortune-telling, and gabbling of Cornish'.15

The 'Tompson' and Collins epitaph

There are doubtless many Cornish patriots that can recite at least the English version of Dolly Pentreath's pretended epitaph, where her advanced age was first claimed:

Old Doll Pentreath, one hundred ag'd and two,
Deceased, and buried in Paul Parish, too: –
Not in the Church, with people great and high,
But in the Church-yard doth old Dolly lie.

This is the English verse translation by Reverend John Collins, 'late of Penryn', of a Cornish original sent in a letter from Truthan in St Erme to Reverend Richard Polwhele on 8 December 1789. It was first 'officially' published in Polwhele's 1806 The Language, Literature, and Literary Characters of Cornwall, part of his massive History of Cornwall published in parts between 1803 and 1808, and reissued in 1816.16 Slight variations in wording and punctuation have been regularly published ever since, very rarely attributed to Collins.

The Reverend John Collins (1742-97) was from a long line of clergymen with holdings in St Erme, and was Vicar of Ledbury in Herefordshire.17 He was distantly related by marriage to Polwhele. From the same Collins' letter Polwhele gave the supposed Cornish original:

Coth Doll Pentreath cans ha deau;
Marow ha kledyz ed Paul plū;
Na ed an Eglous, gan pobel bris,
Bes ed Eglous-hay, coth Dolly es.

He also provided a literal translation:

Old D____ P______ one hundred and two;
Dead and buried in Paul parish: –
Not in the Church, with folks great,
But in Church-yard, Old D______ is.

Polwhele then writes:

The author of these verses ... is a Mr Tompson, a native of Truro, and by profession, what we call in Cornwall, an engineer, – that is, a maker of engines for the use of the mines; to which trade he was bred, under his father, and, in his youth, much employed by Mr Pendarves.18 I met him, at Plymouth-Dock, in 1789* [*"The old man, hearing my name announced to him, saluted me, instantly, with the motto of my family] where he was engaged in superintending the raisers and hewers of stone, under Mr. Paulby. If now living, he must have nearly approached his hundredth year. He is a worthy, and honest old man, – of some knowledge, and much humour; and knows more, I believe, of the Cornish language than the old lady, whom he has celebrated, ever knew. 19

In the quoted letter, Collins refers to the author as 'my friend Tompson'. 20

A second Cornish version

In a footnote to Collins' verse translation Polwhele, clearly peeved, records

I was surprised to see Mr. Collins's translation of this epitaph in 'The Beauties of Cornwall', p. 492, whence it has been copied in several of the public prints. That I should have been anticipated, in a variety of instances, was not to be wondered. But I expected, that this communication of my friend, would have been confined to myself. Its escape, however, was by mere accident. 21

The Beauties of Cornwall by John Britton and Edward Weilake Brayley was published in 1801, indeed pipping Polwhele to the post with a slight variant of Collins' verse. The only significant difference is line 2, which reads:

Both born and in Paul Parish buried too.

But more interesting than this is the printing above it of a different version of the Cornish original:

Coth Dol Pentreath canz ha Deaw
Marir en Bedans en Powl pleu
Na en an Eglar ganna Poble bráz
Bet en Eglar Hay Coth Dolly es!

Although its first publication was in the Beauties of Cornwall in 1801, 22 an identical English and a Cornish version very close to it can be found earlier in the manuscript of John Skinner's 1797 tour to Cornwall, different only in having Mahir for Marir, and Pobl for Poble. 23 The variant English ('Both born and in Paul Parish buried too ...') and the different Cornish (henceforth Version 2) were, like the Polwhele version, also subsequently reprinted many times.

The fact that there are two different versions of the Cornish language version of this epitaph has not often been previously remarked. 24 A Welsh translation appears to belong to a much later period, first appearing in the Cambrian Journal in 1861 but with no identification of the translator. 25 The history of the separate paths of transmission of these versions 1 and 2 thus remains uninvestigated. Nor has any information on the epitaph's claimed author 'Mr Tompson', an engineer of Truro, ever been produced beyond that in Polwhele's original publication of version 1 of the epitaph. Thirdly, no-one to our knowledge has ever assessed the standard of Cornish fluency demonstrated by the poem, although as we have seen Polwhele claimed that Tompson's Cornish was considerably more accomplished than Dolly's own would have been. The rest of this article attempts to follow up on these unasked questions and lines of inquiry. It will also consider the history of the third and only truly physical epitaph for Dolly, that much-photographed monument now placed in the Paul Churchyard wall. This was originally erected by the Reverend John Garrett, vicar of Paul, and Prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte, the distinguished Celtic and Basque linguist in 1860, and subsequently corrected and moved.

Both versions of Tompson's epitaph have been much re-published. Version 1 appeared in at least 13 publications before the anniversary of Dolly's death in 1877. 26 Excluding various Britton and Brayley reprints, version 2 appeared in no fewer than 6 iterations. 27 The ultimate source for Version 1 is clearly Polwhele's 1806 publication, although this is usually forgotten or unacknowledged by those quoting it later.

Mr Tompson was William Thomson

Examination of Admiralty records relating to Plymouth Docks during the 1780s reveals 'Mr Tompson' to be William Thomson (his own spelling), an employee of Mr Thomas Parby (not Paulby) who had a series of lucrative contracts to reconstruct the Docks at that time. One of the contracts was to work on the Mast Yard, and it was Thomson's solution to a problem there that has provided the identification of the Cornish author. On 16 January 1786, from 37 Duke Street at the Dock, William Thomson wrote:

Having been employed several years in the Dock Yard and chiefly for some time past near the Mast Pond my thoughts have often been engaged on some means of destroying the Gribble or small worms, that do so much damage to the Mast and other large Timbers laid up there and I have I hope hit upon a method that seems likely to effect the desired purposes and which (so far as I know) has not been thought of by any other Person. 28

The solution involved the use of quicklime to dislodge the worms. Although Thomson's experiment was approved, we could find no record as to its success or otherwise in Admiralty records. 29
Thomson was not a government employee at the Docks, as he does not appear in the Dockyard paybooks, but clearly a subcontractor employed — as Polwhele noted — by Thomas Parlby. The ‘Tompson’ family (otherwise spelled Thomson, Tamson or Tomson in records) of Truro had a long history in mining. William's grandfather, John Tomson (1724–26), John's wife Grace, already a widow, died in 1728 and was buried at Truro St Mary's Church, now the Cathedral. Their son and William's father, William Thomson, was baptised at Kenwyn and buried at Truro St Mary's (1684–1747). This William I was also a mining engineer according to Polwhele. William I's elder brother Thomas, baptised 1675, was also mentioned in relation to Carnkye Bal in 1699. William's mother, Mary's Church, now the Cathedral. Their son and William's father, William Thomson, was baptised at Kenwyn and buried at Truro St Mary's (1684–1747). This William I was also a mining engineer according to Polwhele. William I's elder brother Thomas, baptised 1675, was also mentioned in relation to Carnkye Bal in 1699.

Our William Tamson (his name in the Kenwyn registers) was baptised on 23 March 1718, one of five children. The others were Loveday (1716–24), James (1721–60), John (1722–75) and Elizabeth (1724–26). William was married in 1758 or earlier but we have not been able to find a record of his marriage, nor the name of his wife. Three children are recorded for this marriage, a daughter Elizabeth Thomson who died in 1758, presumably as an infant, a second Elizabeth who also died young (1763–67) and John, baptised in 1767. They were all baptised and/or buried at Kenwyn. The chronology makes it possible that the engineer Tompson referred to by Polwhele could in fact be William's brother John, still alive in 1789 if the Sally Thompson buried in Truro in that year was his wife Sarah. But the letter of an ingenious William Thomson, associated with the Mast Yard where Parlby had contracts, having worked at the Docks for some years but yet not appearing as a direct employee of the Dockyard makes it almost certain that he is our man.

The Cornish language was last heard around Truro in about 1650, and speak to some of the last few native speakers of Cornish had long retreated to the extreme west of Cornwall by the time William Thomson was born in 1718. Cornish had ceased to be spoken in Penwith and the Lizard peninsula by the time William Thomson was born in 1718. Cornish had ceased to be a community language by about 1736 when William Gwavas was able to speak to some of the last few native speakers of St Just, St Keverne, Paul and Sennen. It is extremely doubtful, therefore, that Thomson would have had any traditional knowledge of Cornish, given where he grew up. There is a possibility that he may have learned some Cornish during his youth, however. For instance, we know of one John Nancarrow, born in 1734 in St Agnes but brought up in West Cornwall, including from 1746 in Ludgvan where his father was a mining engineer. John junior also worked in the mines. He 'had learned the Cornish language from the country people during his youth and can now converse in it', according to the report of Daines Barrington who had been informed of this in 1777 by James Phillips, a London printer and bookseller. Phillips also mentioned 'an inhabitant of Truro, whose name Mr Phillips does not now recollect' as being able to converse in Cornish.

Polwhele was convinced that this Truronian must have been 'Mr Tomson, who wrote a Cornish epitaph on Dolly Pentreath in 1778.' Both John Nancarrow and James Phillips (the latter originally from Redruth) were Quakers and may have met when Nancarrow attended a Quaker yearly meeting in London in 1771. Phillips' father, William Phillips, although originally Welsh, had been the manager of Chasewater mine in Redruth. The mining connection continued, as James Phillips was the publisher of William Pryce's Mineralogia Cornubiensis in 1778. Presumably Phillips knew, at least by hearsay, of William Thomson from his mining connections.

It is possible that William Thomson had contacts among the Cornish savants researching the language during the eighteenth century, but William Gwavas and Thomas Tonkin were both dead by the time he reached the age of 25. He was a contemporary of William Borlase (1695–1772) and Borlase's relative by marriage William Pryce (1735–90), both of whom had interests in both mining and the Cornish language. William Borlase was a close friend of the father of Reverend John Collins, Edward Collins the vicar of Breage and later St Erth. Borlase had sight of the manuscript of Tonkin's Archaeologia Cornubiana — later in the possession of and published in abridged form by Pryce — 'from Mr Collins of St Erth, who had procured it for him (as well as I recollect) from the heirs of Thomas Tonkin Esq; by the Reverend Mr James Walker, Vicar of St Agnes'.

Early published sources on Cornish and on Dolly Pentreath

In the twelve years from Dolly's death in 1777 to the Reverend Collins' letter to Polwhele of December 1789 the major published sources of Cornish words available to any patriotic Cornishman, beyond dialect survivals, would have been from the word list contained in William Borlase's Antiquities ... of Cornwall (first edition 1754, second edition 1769) and beyond that from Edward Lhuyd's Archaeologia Britannica of 1707 — a major source of Borlase's vocabulary. William Pryce was yet to publish his abridged version of Tonkin's Archaeologia Cornubiana, which became available the following year, late in 1790.

Interest in and general knowledge about Dolly Pentreath had resulted from Daines Barrington's aforementioned two papers in Archaeologia of 1776 and 1779, and the Cornish Wonder John Opie (1761–1807) had painted her portrait just before her death when he must have been about 16 years old. The Universal Magazine for January 1781 published an article about Dolly and reprinted Barrington's 1773 article, under the signature of 'Alphabeta'... of Berkeley Square, London. This was accompanied by the earliest printed image of Dolly, originally drawn by Richard Scaddon (1720–1780), titled "Dorothy Pentreath of Mousehole in Cornwall, the last person who could converse in the Cornish language." These references establish that Thomson need not have had any personal knowledge of Dolly in order to write her epitaph.

Thomson's Cornish

Richard Polwhele met Thomson in 1789, when the latter was around 70 to 71. As noted earlier, Polwhele was impressed by his seeming knowledge of Cornish – although the only evidence provided of this apart from the epitaph is that at their meeting Thomson was able to quote the Polwhele motto in Cornish, Karena whelas Karenza, love worketh (or seeketh) love. It is possible that Thomson penned Dolly's epitaph at Polwhele's instigation or at least did so as a response to his interest, rather than soon after Dolly's death as later claimed by Polwhele. This would explain the seeming coincidence of Polwhele meeting Thomson earlier in the year (1789) in which he was sent the epitaph by Collins. It would also explain Polwhele's displeasure at the publication of version 2 and of a variant of Collins' English verse version in the Britton and Brayley publication of 1801.

How competent in fact are versions 1 and 2 in representing real knowledge of the language in its Late or Modern form? Not much at all, it appears. Perhaps most glaring is the lack of mutation in Poble bráz or pobél bráis in either version, which should have been pobél vras. The circumflex over the 'a' is ultimately taken from Lhuyd's Archaeologia Britannica. Lhuyd used a to show vowel length only, and it can stand for [IPA: æ], [IPA: æ] and [IPA: æ]. Both versions also misuse coth as a prefix, in imitation of Welsh hén. Cornish also has hén and it could have been used in this context if it had been known to Thomson. As a prefix coth can only be used in compounds such as cothwas, the old boy (Ordinalia, Passio Christi) and cotheneb, olden times (John Tregor).

In version 1 kledyz and pleu are both ultimately perhaps taken from Lhuyd, but ed between the two is misspelled. En becomes et or ed only before vowels in the definite article and possessive adjectives. It is correctly used in the phrase ed an eglos but should be ed an eglos-hay rather than ed eglos-hay as in version 1. Eglos-hay may have been a current form for churchyard in eighteenth-century Cornish but is not otherwise attested. It is more probably an invention or literal translation. Eglos is indeed Cornish for church but in Late or Modern Cornish had already become egliz or eglez (Nicholas Boson, John Boson, Edward Lhuyd; but note eglos in William Rowe). Gan occurs in Middle Cornish in Passio Christi and also in William Jordan; the usual Late Cornish form would be gen.

The Cornish of version 2 is even less competent than version 1. As well as the shared errors noted above, it also brings in several additional infelicities. Maric (or Mahir) en Bedans could have been meant for something like marow en bédh, dead in the grave. Alternatively, it recalls the words of William Hals' version of the Creed, marawes hag bethens, dead and buried. This had been published in Hals' Complete History of Cornwall under the parish of Creed in 1750, so may have been available to the author. Powl pleu is a forced word order to achieve a rhyme between Deaw (Lhuyd: déau, IPA: de:a) and pleu (Lhuyd: pleu, IPA: pleu) where the vowels are not in fact identical. Ganna is not Cornish in this context. It could have been in imitation of Welsh gyda, in, but what might have been intended was gen a/an, with the. If so then pleb should have undergone mutation to become boble. Gana as a word does occur in ganawhy, with you. Bet en again represents a misapplied and misunderstood use of the phenomenon whereby en becomes et before vowels in the definite article and possessive adjectives. As a word bet occurs in Lhuyd's betanurna where it is a form of biz, until and should here be byz, but. Eglar could be extracted from the place-name Eglarooze in St Germans in the far east of Cornwall, where it reflects colloquial pronunciation. The remarks on eglos-hay refer equally to Eglar Hay here.

The forced rhyme Deaw or deau/pleu and forced word order of Powl Pleu suggest that book-learning rather than natural rhyme was behind the two versions of this epitaph.

Both versions suggest the marks of an 'educated' gentleman using scraps of Cornish from published sources, poorly understood. The writer 'D' had already come to a similar conclusion in the second decade of the nineteenth century. He wrote:

I look to Mr. Tomson to have been an ingenious man, who having a taste for such studies, had made himself master of the best remaining pieces in Cornish. This is certainly a far more rational account, than to imagine with some, that he was a rarely gifted individual, in whom the Cornish language had survived after the death of the humble inhabitant of Mousehole. Mr Tomson might even have been able to converse in it; but there would have been nothing extraordinary in it, as thousands can speak Latin and other languages, which they have acquired only from books. As to the epitaph, I do not entirely rest on conjecture; for all the words in it, with the exception of one only, are to be found in Berlaus's Vocabulary. Hay is a well known Saxon word, which signifies an inclosure, and has long been incorporated with the Cornish.
This is not quite correct. All of the words of version 1 except hay and also kledyz can be found in the same spelling in Borlase's 1769 word list. Lhuyd had published kledh, dith, and it is possible that an attentive reader of his Archaeologia Britannica could have formed a past participle from that word with the form kledyz. If not then it provides possibly the only evidence of some traditional knowledge of Cornish in the poem, as kleithez, buried, occurs in John Boson's version of the Creed, and is found as klyethes in a manuscript in the Morrab Library compiled or copied by Reverend Henry Ustickie (1720–69), at one time William Borlase's curate at St Just and from 1755 until his death vicar of Breage. Version 2 includes the phrase Marir en Bedens, possibly inspired by Hals' published version of the Creed, but Eglar, church, seems colloquial – albeit colloquial in East Cornwall. Marir en Bedens could conceivably be merely a garbled version of Thomson's original Marow ha kledyz.

At the time of writing the epitaph and until after about 1859 with Norris' publication of the Ordinalia there would have been very few people around with enough knowledge of Cornish to correct Thomson. This would also explain why both versions have been published repeatedly over the last two centuries, usually without comment. At least Canon Williams, soon to become the author of the Lexion Cornu-Britannicum, attempted some exegesis of the individual words in 1861, even though he did not provide any comment on the standard of Cornish represented.

Three myths about Dolly Pentreath

Various myths have grown up around these two versions of Dolly's epitaph. The first is of course that she was 102 when she died. Dolly exaggerated her own age. In 1772 she had claimed to be 86, which would have made her birth around 1686 rather than 1692. Had she indeed died in 1788 as was later claimed, first of all by Richard Warner in 1809 and later in Hitchen and Drew's 1817/1824 History of Cornwall, she would indeed have been 102 on her own calculation.

It was widely assumed that one or other version of the epitaph was placed on a memorial marking Dolly's grave, although as a pauper her grave would most likely have been unmarked. This erroneous belief was still current in Mousehole in about 1856, as reported by Edwin Dunkin, and was retailed to Reverend Fred W. P. Jago in 1881 by a Mr Trewavas of Mousehole, then in his 88th year. Another equally erroneous idea was that the epitaph itself was a joke perpetrated upon John Britton in 1800 by a local 'wag' during his visit to Cornwall. In 1855 this story was reported as being 'now pretty well known' by G. Arthur Festing. Subsequently John J. A. Boase of Penzance claimed to be able to put a name to the wag's face. He wrote:

the real author was Mr. John Scaddon, schoolmaster, Penzance …

... When Mr. Britton was in the West collecting materials for his well-known work The Beauties of England and Wales, Mr. Scaddon, among other more trustworthy information, told him that an epitaph in Cornish was to be found in Paul Churchyard, and on Mr. Britton expressing a desire for a copy, he undertook to procure it for him; and to save his credit concocted, with the assistance of Pryce's Grammar and Vocabulary of the Cornish Language, the lines to the memory of Dolly Pentreath. The ingenious fabrication was discovered in time to prevent Mr. Britton giving them to the world.

Of course, as we have seen, John Britton did indeed provide the first publication of the epitaph but we know of its existence from at least 1789, long before Britton ever visited Cornwall. The presumably mythical schoolteacher John Scaddon may be a garbled memory of Richard Scaddon, the artist, whose etching of Dolly Pentreath was – as already noted above – published in the Universal Magazine in 1781.

'The one a Frenchman and the other an Irishman':

the third epitaph

The epitaph on Dolly's memorial in the wall of Paul Churchyard currently reads:

HERE LIETH INTERRED
DOROTHY PENTREATH WHO DIED IN 1777.
SAID TO HAVE BEEN THE
LAST PERSON WHO CONVERSED
IN THE ANCIENT CORNISH, THE REGULAR LANGUAGE OF THIS COUNTY FROM THE EARLIEST RECORDS
TILL IT EXPIRED IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY IN THIS PARISH OF SAINT PAUL.
THIS STONE IS ERECTED BY
THE PRINCE
LOUIS LUCIEN BONAPARTE
IN UNION WITH THE REV'D JOHN GARRET
VICAR OF ST PAUL
JUNE 1860
HONOUR THY FATHER AND THY MOTHER
THAT THY DAYS MAY BE LONG UPON
THE LAND WHICH THE LORD THY GOD
GIVETH THEE

GWRA PERTHI DE TAZ HA DE MAM
MAL DE DYTHIOW BETHENZ HYR WAR
AN TYR NEB AN ARLETH DE DEW RYES DEES.

On the other side of the monument, facing the Church, it states:

DOROTHYPENTREATH
WHO CONversed
IN ANCIENT CORNISH DIED IN 1777
THIS STONE IS ERECTED BY
THE PRINCE
LOUIS LUCIEN BONAPARTE
AND THE REV'D JOHN GARRETT
1860

The quotation from Exodus 20 verse 12 also occurs in Deuteronomy 5, verse 16 as the fifth Commandment, and it was in this latter context that it has come down to us from eighteenth-century Cornish translations.

Was Dolly better served by this third epitaph in Cornish, in terms of its linguistic competence? Probably not. It comes from the Ten Commandments as written by William Gwavas in the so-called Bilbao Manuscript, which was in the Prince's possession in some time before 1859. In the manuscript it reads:

Gwra perthi, de Taz, ha de Mam, mal de

It seems to be Gwavas' 'correction' of a version of the fifth Commandment by John Keigwin, as just such a version with Gwavas' corrections in the left margin occurs in a manuscript in the British Library. It reads:

Gwra worry de Taz, ha de Mam, mal de Dèthio bëns pel var an Tir neb an Arleth de Deu es Reiz dez.

Gwavas offered hyula/perthi for worry, bethens for bëns, and hier or hir for pel among the marginal notes.

John Keigwin (1642-1716) was at least a native speaker of Cornish, unlike Gwavas, and it is not clear that the 'corrected' version was an improvement. Keigwin was himself an educated man, and was trying to reproduce what he imagined to be a more 'classical' form of Cornish, taken from the earlier written forms of the plays of the late Medieval period. This has led to much - not wholly justified - criticism of his own Cornish expression.

Canon Williams also provided some analysis in the Cambrian journal for 1861 for this third epitaph, giving what he considered to be a proper rendition as:

Gwra perthy dhe das ha'ath vam
Mal y fy'dh dhe dhydhinyow hir
War an tir, neb an Arleth dhe Dhew
A rôs dhyso.

In addition he included a Welsh version, suggesting perhaps that he was also the author of the unattributed Welsh translation of version 1 of Thomson's epitaph in the same article. Williams observed: 'The Cornish texts of the two epitaphs are of the latest form, and consequently very much corrupted: they are of little importance in a philological point of view.'

Some further analysis of Gwavas' text is worthwhile:

gwra, de 2nd person singular is a correct imperative from William Jordan.

perthi, respect, honour 2nd person singular is also an imperative in its own right, cf. parthy in Thomas Tonkin, equivalent to Welsh parchu.

William Gwavas elsewhere has parthi mateyrn honour (the) king, 2nd person plural.
De, thy is found in Thomas Boson, the e being obscure.

taz, father is so found in John Boson and William Gwavas [táz]. This should have been mutated to daz/dáz after de/dha.

mam, mother is elsewhere so found only in William Jordan., or when unstressed as the element of another word such as mamguenen, stock of bees (William Jordan). However it should have been mutated to vam/vabm.

mal, so that may is correct. It is only found as such in William Gwavas, malla in John Tregear, mala in William Rowe, mol in Thomas Boson, and moll in William Borlase. It should have been followed by an infinitive boaz, as mal and bethenz/bethens/bedhanz cannot be used together.

Bethenz, may they be, seems to have been adapted from Edward Lhuyd's bedhanz, otherwise only found in William Jordan and earlier sources as bethens.

dythiow, days, in this spelling is otherwise unattested. William Jordan has dythyow. John Boson uniquely used the termination -iow in dethiow and the form here might be a copying from his work.

byr, long, has been taken from the Ordinalia, being found as heer in William Rowe and heere, here in Tonkin's vocabulary in the Bilbao Manuscript.

tyr, land has also been taken from the Ordinalia in this spelling, occurring as tyre in William Jordan, teere elsewhere in William Gwavas, tir in John Tonkin and John Boson.

Neb an Arleth de Dew ryes dees, which the Lord thy God gave thee. A William Gwavas copy of John Boson's version has an Tir es res these gen guz Arleth Dieu. This is correct for the period although neb normally became leb.

ryes is a past participle, given, which cannot be used like this; gave would have to be rôz or a rôz, but this would have to have been written after neb/leb as leb rôz. Even this would not be a typical Modern Cornish construction or even correct syntax. Compare the good constructions of Thomas Boson en tereth neb a regue de Arlith.

due ry dez, in the land that the Lord thy God gave thee, John Boson es res thec es gen guz Arleth Dieu which is literally that has been given to thee by the Lord thy God, and William Rowe en powe reg an Taze da Deew ry theeze.

1860–1887: years of contestation

As soon as the Bonaparte-Garrett memorial was erected it caused controversy, in part because of its assertion that Dolly was the last Cornish speaker, but also because it seems that its original placement was the result of a misunderstanding as to near which churchyard gate Dolly's remains were buried. In correspondence with Reverend Fred Jago, Bernard Victor, grandson of George Badcock who was the undertaker who superintended Dolly's funeral and made her coffin, wrote that the monument was placed in the wall of the churchyard 'below the upper gate, but it should have been placed below the, lower gate, so there was the mistake by the person who gave the information' to the Prince. Victor noted that he had heard stories about Dolly direct from his grandfather, who died when Bernard was nearly 15, and from other old people who had known Dolly directly.

Another error was the date of Dolly's death, originally given on the monument as 1778 rather than 1777. This presumably relied on Polwhele's incorrect statement that she died in January 1778. Jago published his correspondence with Bernard Victor and the details of his investigations into the correct position of Dolly's grave in 1882. Further details of her life contained in correspondence from Victor were published by Jago in 1887. Bernard Victor died at Mousehole on 16 July 1890, about a month before his 73rd birthday, the last almost direct link to Dolly herself.

Both the error of the date of Dolly's death and that of the memorial's placement in 1860 were finally corrected on 17 August 1887, apparently following a request by the Prince to Bernard Victor to undertake the task. The work was done by Mr J. S. Tregenza and his men, who chiseled 7 instead of 8 on the memorial and moved it 47 feet to its current location. In preparing the new place for the monument a Mr Penrose dug behind the wall at the appointed spot and encountered a grave thought to be that of Dolly herself, including remains of her coffin and either two or three teeth remaining in the lower jaw of the roughly 5 feet 2 inches long skeleton. An interested crowd soon gathered. Happily, Dolly was not fully exhumed nor her bones removed. She remains there still, hopefully at peace, behind her much-photographed monument.
The Three Epitaphs of Dolly Pentreath

5. This was convincingly established by W. Trefry Hoblyn, 'The Probable Parentage of Dorothy Pentreath', Old Cornwall 2/11 (1936), pp. 7-9.
6. The Blue baptism register in the Cornwall Record Office (CRO), Truro, reads for 1729, Oct. 18 John, base child of Dolly Pentreath.
7. Information from the parish registers in the CRO. We have examined Pentreath and Jeffrey family entries in Paul and surrounding parish registers and can see no other likely explanation, as there is no otherwise 'missing' John Jeffrey likely to have been buried in 1778.
8. D. Barington, 'On the expiration of the Cornish language', Archaeologia 3 (1776), pp. 278-84 (the quotations are on p. 282) and 'Mr. Barington on some additional information relative to the continuance of the Cornish language', Archaeologia 5 (1779), pp. 81-6; see DNB for details of Daines Barington's life.
9. Barington, 'On the expiration of the Cornish language', p. 283; Milles (1714-84) was President of the Society 1769-84, see DNB. Some details of the life of Walter Borlase, long-time Vicar of Madron, are given in Peter Pool's biography of Walter's brother, the antiquary William Borlase; see P. A. S. Pool, William Borlase (Truro, 1986).
11. Barington, 'Mr. Barington on ... the continuance of the Cornish language', p. 83; see also P. A. S. Pool and O. J. Padel, 'William Bodinar's letter 1778, Journal of the Royal Institution of Cornwall (IRIC) n.s. 7(3) (1975-6), pp. 231-6. The passage in Cornish as corrected by Pool and Padel reads: 'na ges moye vel pager pe pemp en drewa nye/ ell elapia Corono(a)ck leben/ poble coath pager egance bloiht/ Cornook ewi oll nieceaves yen pobl yowk'.
13. Letter from Castle Horneck quoted by Barington, 'Mr. Barington on ... the continuance of the Cornish language', p. 283.
14. See M. Spriggs, 'Where Cornish was spoken and when: a provisional synthesis in P. Payton (ed.), Cornish Studies: Eleven (Exeter, 2003), pp. 253-4. Since that publication Spriggs has identified British Library (BL) Add. Ms. 51,020 as being the original or a copy of a letter from John Hickes of Trevethick in St Ewe referring to Edward Lhuyd's 1700 visit to Cornwall. Hickes noted that 'Mr Keigwin who best understands our Comish Language of any living & in ye Town ye Coman Language is Cornish' and the town referred to is Mousehole, not Penzance as Spriggs had it in 2003, p. 254.

Conclusion

Dolly's competence in Cornish is attested by Daines Barrington, by Walter Borlase, by a Mousehole fisherman interviewed by Polwhele twenty years after her death, and perhaps less certainly by later oral traditions in the area. The various versions of her epitaph were not written by persons with much, if any, traditional knowledge of the Cornish language. Polwhele adjudged William Thomson to be a more accomplished Cornish speaker than Dolly herself, but he was scarcely qualified to judge. The evidence of versions 1 and 2 of traditional knowledge of the Cornish language. Polwhele adjudged William Gwavas, whose version of the Cornish and so changed Keigwin's he trusted more to earlier written sources than to living speakers for correct native speakers, including John Keigwin. But, like other savants of the time, he trusted more to earlier written sources than to living speakers for 'correct' Cornish and so changed Keigwin's version of the Commandment.

Dolly was not 102 years old when she died as claimed in versions 1 and 2. Nor was she the last person who could converse in the Cornish language, as claimed on the memorial marking her resting place. But the claim that she was the last recorded fluent native speaker of the language remains justified by the most reliable evidence to hand. Her place in history was fully understood by those who gathered in Mousehole in 1877 on the 100th anniversary of her death. It can be argued that on that occasion many of the seeds of the current Cornish revival were sown.71 We do indeed owe Dolly a lot.

Notes and references

1. Taken from The Works of Peter Pindar, Esq. [John Wolcott] (London, 1830), p. 145. The following line is 'The last who jabbered Cornish, so says Daines'.
3. This was fully recognised by F. W. P. Jago, The Ancient Language and the Dialect of Cornwall ... (Truro, 1882), pp. 340-1. It was reiterated by R. M. Nance, 'Further Note on Dolly Pentreath', Old Cornwall 2/11 (1936), pp. 9-10 and by P. A. S. Pool, The Death of Cornish (Penzance, 1982), pp. 25-8. Pool also reproduced Opic's painting of Dolly in that volume.
4. See for instance 'D' in Classical Journal 42 (1818-20), pp. 27-8 who writes: 'I readily allow the claims of Dolly to some jargon that was not English; but with her habits and situation in life, it is ridiculous to suppose, that she could have been the depository of the true Cornish.' Almost a century later similar sentiments were expressed by E. WC'E. Whitfield Crofts) in his volume Cornish Notes and Queries, edited under the pen-name of 'Peter Penn' (London, 1906), pp. 111-12, where he calls her a 'fraud'.

29. ADM 174/119, Letters from Plymouth Dock Commissioner 1783–87, 22 January 1786 is approval for the experiment; 8 December 1785 was approval for work at the Mast Yard; 12 February 1786 reported on Parby and Templar completing the cross wall on the Mast Pond.

30. Spriggs searched the Ordinary and Extraordinary pay lists for Thomson: ADM106/3006; ADM42/747, 745, 890, 896, 899, 905, 900, 902, 904, 907; ADM174/21, 22, 120, 174, 400. He did find William and John Spriggs, bricklayers in the Dockyard at that time, and from a Loce family.

31. See Allen Buckley, The Story of Mist in Cornwall (Powy, 2005), p. 78. The original document is in the RIC, Mr HA/16/17.

32. Information on the Thomson family is from the International Genealogical Index (IGI), Cornwall Family History Society (CFHS) indexes in Truro, and parish registers in the CRO.

33. A William Thompson married Cecilia Peters 28 October 1751 at St Gluvias, and William Thompson (Biographer: Transcripts: Thomson) married Mary Laity on 31 July 1754 at St Hilary (information from the IGI and CFHS indexes). Either of these may be him.

34. References are given in Spriggs, Where Cornish was spoken, p. 255.

36. Polwhele, Characters of Cornwall, p. 19; it is the only mention by Polwhele of the date of when the epitaph was meant to have been written.

38. See discussion of all four men in DNB.

39. See footnote 17 for details of the family.

40. Barrington, Mr. Barrington on ... the continuance of the Cornish language*, p. 84 quoting from a note on the manuscript, then in the hands of Phillips, who was trying to sell it on behalf of Pryce. See the discussion of the attempts to sell this manuscript in Alan Paxton, William Pryce, M.D. (1735–1790), Old Cornwall 7/9 (1971), pp. 388–96. What remains of the original manuscript of Archeologia Cornu-Britanniae is now in the RIC. Matthew Spriggs is preparing a paper on its history.

42. W. Pryce, Archeologia Cornu-Britanniae (Sherborne, 1790).

44. "Alphabeta", *Observations on the Decay and Cessation of the CORNISH LANGUAGE *; Universal Magazine (January 1781), pp. 21–2. "Alphabeta" got the Vicar of Paul to check the burial register to determine that Dorothy Jeffers (sic) alias Pentraeth (her maiden name) was buried there.
The motto seems to have been first published in the St. Clements section of William Hals, The Complete History of Cornwall, Part II being the Parochial History (Exeter, 1750). Only Part II, Advent to Helston, was ever published. It was quoted from Hals by Davies Gilbert, The Parochial History of Cornwall, vol. I (London, 1838), p. 206. It was known to the earlier Cornish writers such as Gwawas and Tonkin and so must date at least near the beginning of the eighteenth century. For instance, it occurs in the George Borlase Manuscript in the RIC, dated to 1733 and representing Cornish material from Gwawas transcribed for Thomas Tonkin. Robert Morton Nance suspected that most of the known Cornish language family mottoes were a result of the printing of Llwyd's Archaologia Britannica in 1707, 'the Cornish grammar in which gave a short vogue to the disappearing language', and led to some of the gentrified approaching scholars such as William Gwawas for a suitable motto: see 'Cornish Family Mottos', Old Cornwall 1 (April 1925), pp. 18–21. The quotation comes from pp. 18–19.

46. Discussion of Late or Modern Cornish grammar and detailed sources for the Cornish authors that are referred to in this section can be found in R. Gendall, A Student's Grammar of Late and Modern Cornish (Tregirr Vein[Menheniot], 2004). IPA refers to the symbols used in the International Phonetic Alphabet.

47. See the 1861 Welsh translation in footnote 25 for an example.

48. See William Hals, The Complete History of Cornwall. It was quoted from Hals by Davies Gilbert, The Parochial History of Cornwall, vol. I, p. 252. Hals' original manuscript is extant as BL Add. Ms. 29,762, with the Creed occurring on fol. 38r.

50. Llywedd, Archaologia Britannica, p. 244. Llwyd almost invariably used -ys for the common ending, William Jordan used -ys and -ez was standard among most late native writers; see Gendall, A Student's Grammar, p. 91.

51. For kleethez see O. J. Padell, Cornish Writings of the Boson Family (Redruth, 1975), p. 56. The original manuscript in Gwawas' hand is in the Morrab Library, Penzance. John Boson (1655–1730) corresponded with Gwawas in the period 1709–20, see M. Spiggs, 'The Boson Family' entry in DBN. For klyethes see the manuscript labeled Cornish Recipes in the Morrab Library, described by A. Hawke, A new Cornish Manuscript, Cornish Studies (1st series) 14 (1986), pp. 5–14. Both of these manuscripts came to the Morrab from representatives of the Borlase family.

58. See footnote 44.

59. The quotation is from Bernard Victor's letter to F. W. P. Jago of 22 May 1882, part of an exchange of letters on the true location of Dolly's grave, which Victor asserted was some distance from where the 1860 memorial had been placed. The quotation in full reads: 'It is not to be said that the monument is in its right place because it was put there by the order of Prince L.L., Bonaparte, or by the Rev. John Garrett – the one a Frenchman and the other an Irishman!' (in Jago, The Ancient Language and the Dialect, p. 337).

60. See report of the manuscript in Norris, The Ancient Cornish Drama, vol. II, pp. 471–2, where it is noted that it had been purchased by Bonaparte 'a few years ago from the descendants of Mr. Scawen'; see also L. L. Bonaparte, Cornish Literature, Cambrian Journal 4 (1861), pp. 241–5. Norris is clearly in error on this point. It seems instead that the manuscript was purchased from a bookseller: Henry Jeuner, who examined it in Bilbao in 1924, noted a receipt for it from Rodda, the Penzance bookseller, for 8/6d and gave the date as 1860, see his "The Cornish Manuscript in the Provincial Library at Bilbao in Spain", JRIC 21(4) (1925), pp. 421–37. I presume that 1860 is a misreading for 1850, given that Norris had seen it prior to 1859. The Bilbao manuscript is Biblioteca de la Diputacion Foral de Biskai, Bilbao, Spain, Ms. Bv-69. There is a photocopy in the RIC.

61. BL Add. Ms. 28,554, folio 112r.

63. See footnote 23.

64. In "Llallawg", "Cornwall and the Cornish Language", footnote on p. 120; Williams gives a slightly different version of the Commandment in R. Williams, 1865, p. 396, Llandovery.

65. See footnote 47 for sources and conventions.

66. Letter from Bernard Victor to Rev. F. W. P. Jago, 2 May 1882, quoted in Jago, The Ancient Language and the Dialect, p. 337. Jago notes in a footnote on that page that the lower gate is the one that opens into the path leading to the chancel door of Paul Church.

68. Jago, The Ancient Language and the Dialect, pp. 333–41; F. W. P. Jago, Dolly Pentreath, The Western Antiquary VII (2) (July 1887), pp. 25–6. In the manuscript of the planned 2nd edition of Jago's English-Cornish Dictionary in the RIC is further as yet unpublished correspondence between Victor and Jago concerning Dolly. The originals of the published correspondence, with additional material in them that was not published, occur in another bound Jago manuscript volume in the RIC, entitled English-Cornish Dictionary as it Went Through the Press, Also Original Letters About Dolly Pentreath. The date for Victor's death is taken from the copy proof of Jago's

70. W. E. Bailey, 'The Supposed Remains of Dolly Pentreath', Report and Transactions of the Penzance Natural History and Antiquarian Society for 1887–88, n.s. II (1884–88), pp. 365–7; further details are provided in The Cornish Telegraph (25 August 1887), unsigned article, 'Dolly Pentreath'.

71. See, 'The centenary of the Old Cornish language held at Paul 26 Dec 1877', The Cornish Telegraph (1 January 1878), p. 3; Henry Jenner's role on that occasion and significant events that led on from the event are discussed in R. M. Nance, "'Gwas Myghal" and the Cornish Language Revival", Old Cornwall 2/8 (1934), pp. 1–5.