

WORLD CATALOGUE OF THESES ON THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

Diane Dickson and Carol Dossor

PACIFIC MONOGRAPH SERIES No. 1

Familiarity with theses and dissertations on his subject is essential to the research worker. These usually unpublished works are not, however, normally included in bibliographies and manuscript catalogues.

As early as 1955 the growing number of theses on the Pacific islands had led to a demand for a catalogue, which was partially met by the publication of an Index of Social Science Theses on the South Pacific. The growing recognition of the importance of the Pacific area now calls for a more comprehensive inventory, covering all disciplines, which this catalogue attempts to supply.

The catalogue is based on the micro-film Library of Theses on the Pacific Islands maintained by the Department of Pacific History of the Australian National University, and expanded by study of all available theses catalogues and by requests for information from universities known to be interested in Pacific studies. It contains more than 1,000 entries and will be an essential aid to all workers in the field of Pacific studies.

WORLD CATALOGUE OF THESES ON THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

Pacific Monographs

This series, under the general editorship of H. E. Maude, will provide basic reference materials for students of the Pacific. It will comprise works such as bibliographies, manuscript catalogues, and indexes, which will be kept up to date by revised editions or periodic supplements.

PREFACE

One class of literature with which the research worker should be familiar is the theses or dissertations having a bearing on his subject. These normally unpublished works are, however, usually ignored by bibliographies and manuscript catalogues alike, and many a doctoral candidate has prepared his thesis unaware of the existence of other studies having a direct or indirect relation to his own.

Though it is now a decade ago, I can still recollect the astonishment of a post-graduate student on his way to study a New Guinea community when told that a thesis on it had already been written. In the intervening years the astonishment has been more often my own at the waste of research funds and the second-rate, and at times inaccurate, research that can result from the unawareness of existing documentation; for example I have at the moment on my desk for report a thesis which shows no knowledge of there being several others already written of direct relevance to it. Perhaps the classic example is that in which a dissertation already presented at one university was plagiarised by a student at another, and the fraud remained undetected until the oral.

Yet scholars, and their supervisors, are not entirely to be blamed when the researches of others multiply at an ever-increasing rate and, deposited in typescript in some university library, can be traced only after an inordinate expenditure in time and money. Admittedly some countries, and notably the United States, issue cumulative thesis catalogues, but these have to be scanned for each year and the indexing can be misleading for Pacific specialists.

Even by 1955 the growing number of theses on the Pacific Islands had led to a demand for a regional catalogue, which was partially met by the publication under the writer's direction of an Index of Social Science Theses on the South Pacific.¹ Increasing realisation of the unique potential of Oceania as a vast laboratory for both the social and natural scientist, as well as the modern trend towards inter-disciplinary studies, now calls for a more comprehensive inventory, which the present work attempts to supply. It is a most striking indication of the growth of interest in Pacific studies that the list should consist of over 1,000 entries, and that they are no longer virtually confined to dissertations generating from the field research of social anthropologists, but cover the whole range of scholarly inquiry.

The catalogue is based on the microfilm Library of Theses on the

Pacific Islands maintained by the Department of Pacific History of the Australian National University and supplemented by an examination of all available thesis catalogues, requests for supplementary information forwarded to universities known to be interested in post-doctoral Pacific studies, and a list of German theses kindly prepared and forwarded by Dr Gerd Koch, the Pacific specialist at the Museum für Völkerkunde in Berlin. To Dr Koch and the many university scholars and librarians who dealt with our importunities so thoroughly and courteously our sincere thanks are due, with a special vote for Miss Janet Bell, in charge of the Hawaiian and Pacific Islands collections of the University of Hawaii Library, whose contribution went far beyond even a librarian's conception of duty. Our gratitude is also due to Miss Margaret Rodger, Reference Librarian, Massey University of Manawatu. As we were going to press we heard from Miss Rodger that she was engaged on a similar project, though more limited in scope. With commendable generosity, she abandoned her project and forwarded to us her entries, of which twenty were found to be unrecorded. They have now been added.

Practical experience gained in assisting students engaged in Pacific studies has indicated that for ease of reference the catalogue should be divided geographically rather than by subject, since the majority of inquirers seek to know everything written on the area in which they are interested, regardless of topic. In only two instances were the entries on any sub-region or island group so numerous that a further break-down by subject category seemed desirable. Within each section the order is strictly alphabetical by author.

The catalogue lists all doctoral theses on the region that could be discovered, together with Master of Arts theses or their equivalent in other schools (M.Sc., M. Litt., M.B.A., etc.), a few university prize essays and B.A.(Hons) and Dip. Ed. theses considered to be significant contributions to knowledge. Entries marked with an asterisk are in reality long essays rather than theses and are included only when considered of sufficient value to researchers; but it is possible that others also fall into this category and should have been noted.

It is recognised that only doctoral theses are necessarily original contributions to knowledge and that those submitted for sub-doctoral degrees are of more uneven quality. Nevertheless the best Masters theses will be found to be up to the standard of a Ph.D. dissertation in all but length and even the worst contain some information of value to other researchers, if only a bibliography giving references which might otherwise be missed.

In the case of Hawaii all theses below the doctoral level are necessarily selective, and those whose themes are unconnected with the Pacific Islands or are of purely local interest (e.g. studies of college algebra or school cafeterias) are excluded. This was unavoidable in view of the vast output of dissertations from the University of Hawaii, and is fortunately of less consequence since these can be picked up by those interested from the lists contained in The Dictionary Catalog of the Hawaiian Collection,² supplemented by the entries published periodically in Current Hawaiiana. Similarly, in the case of New Zealand, only theses concerned with the Maori or other immigrant groups from the Pacific Islands have been included.

Of theses which are known to have been subsequently published, the publication details have been included whenever they could be ascertained. It is seldom, however, that a thesis is published in the form in which it was originally submitted to the examiners, and most of them will be found to have been extensively revised and usually shortened. Research workers will often, therefore, find it necessary to consult both the printed work and the original thesis on which it is based to ensure that they have read all that the author had to say on his subject.

Doctoral theses submitted to universities in the United States are almost invariably made available for the use of other scholars, usually by means of microfilm or xerox copies obtainable from University Microfilms at Ann Arbor, Michigan, and other theses on application to the university library concerned. The practice is sadly different, however, in most other countries, where the application for a microfilm copy may be refused outright, or the inquirer referred to the author of the thesis, who often declines to permit a copy to be made (usually in the mistaken belief that it may militate against the sales of the book which he intends one day to publish). It is to be sincerely hoped that universities everywhere will eventually come to realise that every thesis should on its acceptance be made automatically available to research workers, and that to do otherwise is to negate the primary functions of a thesis: the increase and dissemination of knowledge.

No bibliography can hope to be complete, and through the nature of its subject matter a thesis catalogue is more than usually liable to errors as well as omissions. Information from some universities, and particularly those in Russia and Japan, could not be obtained, while in a number of instances the exact title of the work was doubtful. Not every thesis could be physically examined and no doubt there are, as a consequence, also mistakes in geographical or subject classification. We can only plead for the clemency normally accorded to the first offender and ask that additions and corrections may be notified to the Department of Pacific History for incorporation in subsequent editions.
