The University

The Australian National University is one of Australia's leading research and teaching institutions. The University is unique in the Australian higher education sector. It was established by the Commonwealth Parliament in 1946 as Australia's only research-oriented university without undergraduate facilities to undertake postgraduate research and study at the highest levels on subjects of national importance to Australia. Its charter is to strengthen the nation's research effort and to set new standards for research in Australia.

The ANU has become an institution of international standing, attracting prominent Australian and international scientists and scholars to its staff. It was one of the first Australian universities to award the higher degree of Doctor of Philosophy, and its graduates hold distinguished teaching and research positions at universities around the world.

Undergraduate courses were first offered in 1960 through amalgamation with the Canberra University College. In 1992 the Canberra Institute of the Arts, comprising the Canberra School of Art, the Canberra School of Music and the Australian Centre for the Arts and Technology, amalgamated with the University.

The ANU has more than 10,500 students, of whom approximately 2,400 are postgraduates. About one in 10 students come from overseas, drawn from 60 countries. The University has about 1,200 academic staff and 2,200 technical and general staff.

The University's Institute of Advanced Studies has eight Research Schools: Biological Sciences, Chemistry, Earth Sciences, Information Science and Engineering, Pacific and Asian Studies, Physical Sciences and Engineering, Social Sciences, and the John Curtin School of Medical Research, together with the Mount Stromlo and Siding Spring Observatories, the School of Mathematical Sciences, the Centre for Information Science Research, the Centre for Visual Sciences and the National Centre for Epidemiology and Population Health. These Schools and Centres award postgraduate degrees and offer postgraduate research opportunities.

Undergraduate and postgraduate degree courses are offered through the Faculties of Arts, Asian Studies, Economics and Commerce, Engineering and Information Technology, Law, and Science, and through the Institute of the Arts. In addition there are University Academic Centres: the Centre for Resource and Environmental Studies, the Humanities Research Centre and the NHMRC Social Psychiatry Research Unit.

The University's Graduate School spans both parts of the University. Graduate students are enrolled in 39 University-wide graduate programs which offer a full range of postgraduate degrees and diplomas.

The University Library System, with 1.76 million volumes, comprises three main libraries, the Law library and five branch libraries in the sciences.

The Centre for Continuing Education provides a community education program, an extension program which includes conferences on issues of public importance, and refresher courses for professional and other occupational groups.

For nearly 50 years the ANU has produced renowned scientists, economists, historians, jurists, geographers, linguists and mathematicians. It has more members of the honoured academic societies than any other Australian university. ANU staff undertake fundamental research in areas such as medicine, physics, astronomy, chemistry, biology, the earth sciences, information science and engineering. The high quality of the ANU's contributions to the social sciences and the humanities is also widely acknowledged.

Academic staff in the Institute of Advanced Studies and The Faculties are involved in hundreds of collaborative research projects with other Australian and overseas universities and institutions and the CSIRO. Within the University, the size and diversity of the ANU's disciplinary strengths allow it to link various academic activities to tackle large scientific and social questions which often cannot be solved by a single discipline. As a result, the ANU has a number of major interdisciplinary projects in basic, application-oriented and strategic research across Research Schools and The Faculties. These intra-University links strengthen the ANU's undergraduate teaching and provide research training opportunities for students.

The Academic Procession

Today's ceremony will begin with an academic procession led by the University's ceremonial officers, the University Marshal, the Esquire Bedell and Deputy Marshals. The procession will be in four parts. The first will be members of the University Choral Society. Academic and other staff of the University, led by two Deputy Marshals carrying staves, will form the second part of the procession. Chancellors and Vice-Chancellors of other Australian Universities, also led by two Deputy Marshals, will follow.

The University Marshal and two Deputy Marshals will lead the Pro-Chancellor's Procession. This will comprise members of the University's Council and special guests, followed by an Assistant Marshal, the Registrar, the Heads of Research Schools, Deans of The Faculties, the Dean of the Graduate School, the Dean of Students, the Master of University House, two Pro-Vice-Chancellors, the Chair of the Board of the Institute of Advanced Studies, the Chair of the Board of The Faculties, two Deputy Vice-Chancellors, a representative of the Australian Government, Sir Llewellyn Edwards, AC, Chancellor of the University of Queensland, Archbishop Tutu, and Professor Geoffrey Brennan. The Esquire Bedell, carrying the silver mace, immediately precedes the Vice-Chancellor. The Pro-Chancellor will enter last.

The Chancellor will be escorted into Llewellyn Hall during the ceremony by the University Marshal.

At the end of the ceremony, the Chancellor will lead the procession from the hall. The order will be the reverse of that for the entry procession.

Musical Program

Organist: Esther Lovett from the Canberra School of Music, Institute of the Arts.

The fanfares will be played by Peter Wiseman and Petra Hanson (trumpets), Brendan Jubb (horn) and Terry Leahy and Chris Aschman (trombones) of the Canberra School of Music.

Choir: Members of the ANU Choral Society, conducted by Trish Shaw, will sing Advance Australia Fair, N'kosi Sikele (Soutonga), Laudate Nomen Domini (Christopher Tye) and Gaudeamus Igitur (Anon).

Musical Interlude: Bronwyn Kirkpatrick (clarinet), Ann Holtzapffel and Stephanie Higgs (violins), Daniel Conlon, (viola) and Megan Taylor (cello) from the Canberra School of Music will perform Brahms' Clarinet Quintet, Opus 115.

Academic and Ceremonial Dress

Traditional academic dress is worn at The Australian National University on ceremonial occasions and at formal events in the halls and colleges. The wide range of styles and colours of the academic dress worn by staff at ANU reflects the international character of the University. Academic dress styles at most universities established in the tradition of the first universities in Bologna, Paris and Oxford, are similar to the everyday clothing fashions of the Middle Ages. As academics at the early universities were mostly in religious orders, the garb they wore became the traditional dress for academics. The styles, colours and materials used for gowns, hoods and caps at most universities change according to the seniority of the degree.

ANU's academic dress is based on the styles worn at Oxford, Cambridge and the University of London. The colours on the hoods represent the degree awarded—Bachelor's hoods have a narrow band of colour; Master's hoods are fully lined with colour. Both wear a square black cap. Doctors of Philosophy wear a black gown faced with blue corded silk, a hood of blue corded silk lined with the same silk, and a black velvet cap with blue cord and tassel. Doctors other than Doctor of Philosophy wear a scarlet gown and a scarlet hood—in the case of Doctor of Fine Arts, lined with silver corded silk; of Doctor of Laws, purple corded silk; of Doctor of Letters, blue corded silk; of Doctor of Science, green corded silk—and a black velvet cap with gold cord and tassel.

The Chancellor of The Australian National University wears a gown of black damask figured silk trimmed with gold and a black cap trimmed with gold lace. The Pro-Chancellor's gown and cap are similar to those of the Chancellor, but are trimmed with silver lace and the gown does not have a train.

The Vice-Chancellor's gown is made of black damask silk trimmed with gold lace and a black cap trimmed with gold. The Deputy Vice-Chancellors' gowns and caps are identical to those of the Vice-Chancellor except they are trimmed with silver. Other senior staff wear the academic dress which relates to the highest degree they hold.

The University Marshal wears a blue gown faced with gold corded silk and a cap trimmed with blue and gold. Deputy Marshals wear their own academic dress and carry staves. The Esquire Bedell, whose ancient ceremonial role is to protect the Vice-Chancellor, wears a black gown of damask figured silk, trimmed with gold and a black cap trimmed with gold, and carries the University Mace. University Council members other than graduates wear a black academic gown and a silver silk stole with two horizontal blue bars and an embroidered University crest.

Academic staff wear either their own academic dress or a black gown and a silver silk stole with an embroidered University crest.
