About this Document

This book contains a record of Solomon Islands' electoral history from 1967 to 2013. The first section provides background and some basic analysis of the results of elections for Solomon Islands' national parliament. The second section contains election results, by year and electorate, for every general election from 2010 to 1967. The third section covers election results, by year and electorate, for every by-election for which election results still exist (some by-election results have been lost). An appendix at the end of the book provides details on current electorates and a map of Solomon Islands electorates.

Please note that the data in the results tables are not official election results. Sometimes they have come from newspaper reports and other reporting as well as the Solomon Islands Gazette (the country's official parliament gazette). You can find (most) official election results in the Solomon Islands Gazette. Results presented in this book have been checked back to source data but we cannot guarantee the original sources were accurate in every instance.

A PDF version of this document, as well as election results in Excel and other formats can be downloaded from: <http://www.cdi.anu.edu.au/>

Questions about the document and data should be emailed to Terence Wood:

About the Centre for Democratic Institutions

The Centre for Democratic Institutions (CDI) is a leading centre for policy analysis and engagement on democratic governance in South-East Asia and the Pacific. Situated in the State, Society and Governance in Melanesia Program (SSGM) in the Australian National University's College of Asia and the Pacific, our mandate is to support democratic processes in the region through engagement with current policy debates regarding democracy and political governance, and to facilitate partnerships between Australia and our close neighbours through knowledge and skills sharing.

We are committed to supporting functioning electoral processes and parliamentary systems through collaborations with democratic institutions and democratic stakeholders in the region. CDI harnesses Australian and regional expertise in democratic practice, governance and institutional development to facilitate the transfer of knowledge and skills between democratic practitioners. We conduct tailored training courses and support a program of capacity-building activities for political practitioners and institutions.

CDI is interested in how democratic change influences broader processes of political and economic development, and participation in political processes, particularly that of women. CDI's relationship with SSGM allows it to draw on current research to inform its own analysis and to enhance the effectiveness of its programming and policy engagement. For example, CDI is drawing on evidence-based knowledge of the challenges faced by woman political candidates in Melanesia to develop new strategies for supporting increased representation of women in political systems.

Acknowledgements

We are grateful to Jon Fraenkel, Harry Greenwell and Ian Frazer whose election and election-related data were useful in the creation of the results database. We are particularly grateful to the staff of the Solomon Islands Electoral Commission, the Solomon Islands Parliamentary Library, and the Solomon Islands National Archive, who were very helpful in assisting with efforts to collect results data.

Trends and Key Features of Solomon Islands Elections Results

In 1967 Solomon Islands held its first national, mass suffrage, parliamentary elections. For the first time, voters across the British colony had a direct say in the election of 13 members of the colonial Legislative Council (Moore 2013).<sup>1</sup> In between 1967 and the country's independence in 1978, Solomon Islands held three further general elections. Solomon Islands held its first national election as an independent nation in 1980. Between 1980 and the time of writing (May 2014) it has held eight general elections (1980, 1984, 1989, 1993, 1997, 2001, 2006 and 2010). Its ninth general election is scheduled to be held towards the end of 2014.

The results from these elections, who stood and how many votes they won, have become very hard to find. The National Archive has some and the Parliamentary Library has some in gazettes, but others exist only in copies of old newspapers kept by academics. The purpose of this book is to bring Solomon Islands election results together in one place so that future researchers and future generations of Solomon Islanders can access data from the country's founding electoral history.

The book is in three parts. The first section provides background on Solomon Islands elections including electoral rules and other aspects of the country's electoral system. It also describes the key features and trends of Solomon Islands' electoral history. The second section lists election results, by year and electorate, for every general election from 2010 to 1967. The third section provides election results, by year and electorate, for every by-election where results were available (results were not available for all by-elections). An appendix at the end of the book contains a map of Solomon Islands electorates and details on current electorates.

Please note that the data in the results tables are not official election results. Sometimes they have come from newspaper reports and other reporting as well as the Solomon Islands Gazette. You can find (most) official election results in the gazette. Results presented in this book have been checked back to the sources they were gathered from, but we cannot guarantee the original sources were 100 per cent accurate in every instance.

Electoral Rules, Elections and Electorates

National elections in Solomon Islands are held using a single member district plurality (or 'first past the post') voting system (a system inherited from the United Kingdom, which ran the country's first pre-independence elections). Since 1997 the country has had 50 electorates, each of which sends one member of parliament (MP) to the national parliament (Steeves 2001, p. 799–800).<sup>2</sup> The candidate who wins the plurality of votes in an electorate becomes its MP. Nationwide general elections are held approximately every four years. Intermittent by-elections have also taken place upon the death or removal, usually via court ruling, of MPs from office during the electoral term (Moore 2013; Steeves 2001).

<sup>1</sup> There had been one previous election (in 1964) in which voters voted in Honiara, while the rest of the country used an electoral college system in which local councillors selected their parliamentary representatives. In 1967 the electoral college system was continued in the Eastern Outer Islands electorate; however, in the rest of the country voters, not members of an electoral college, chose. In addition to elected members there were also 15 un-elected members of the 1967 Legislative Council.

Given they are held in an environment of low administrative capacity, and across a challenging geography, recent Solomons elections (particularly those in 2010) have been generally well run (Commonwealth Secretariat 2010). Observer teams and a system of open vote counting which permits candidates' agents to scrutinise the counting process have meant that election results, at least in recent years, have been mostly free of major wrongdoing directly involving the mechanics of the electoral process itself (Commonwealth Secretariat 2010; East-West Center 2010; Pacific Islands Forum Secretariat 2010). However, outside the formal electoral process problems with vote-buying are significant and some voters face at least tacit coercion (Wood 2014).

Elections are peaceful for the most part. Brawls between the supporters of rival candidates are not unheard of and occasional incidents such as the burning of ballot boxes have taken place, yet voting has usually been free of serious large-scale violence (Commonwealth Secretariat 2006; Commonwealth Secretariat 2010; Nanau 2011, p. 508).<sup>3</sup>

The only major blight on the operation of recent national elections has been the electoral roll, which contains many more voters than could possibly exist (Commonwealth Secretariat 2006; Commonwealth Secretariat 2010; Kelly 2010; Paternorte and de Gabriel 2010). The 2010 roll had 448,149 registered voters, which contrasts with an estimated voting-age population of 281,161 (estimated on the basis of projections from 2009 census data).

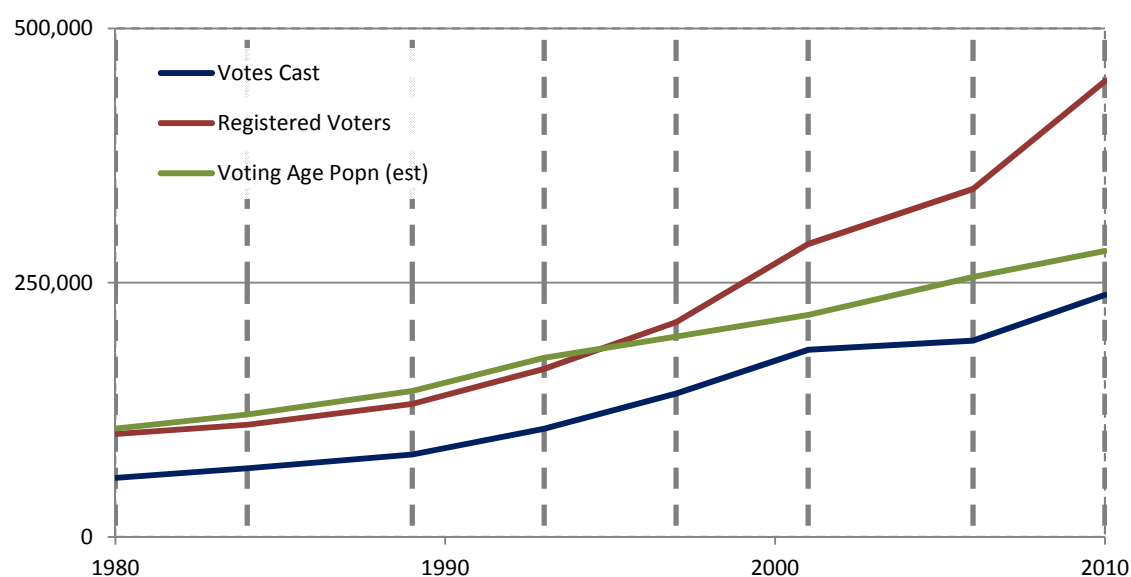

Figure 1 charts Solomon Islands elections since independence and shows the number of registered voters, the total number of votes cast, and the estimated voting-age population. General election years are shown as dashed vertical lines. The figure also offers a sense of voter turnout. While turnout has been nominally low in recent elections (only 53 per cent of registered voters in 2010), when calculated as a proportion of the estimated voting-age population, turnout is actually fairly high (85 per cent in 2010).

<sup>2</sup> In the first election in 1967 there were 14 electorates, in 1970 there were 17, in 1973 there were 24. From 1976 to 1993 there were 38 electorates. This increased to 47 in 1993 and to 50 in 1997.

<sup>3</sup> Sanga (2005) describes small-scale post-election violence in the East Malaita constituency after the 2001 elections, and Fraenkel (2008) and Allen (2008) note that there was considerable voter intimidation in some electorates during the 2001 elections, which took place in the midst of the Tensions. More subtle voter coercion also takes place at times. Yet large-scale election-related conflict as occurs in many developing countries, including neighbouring Papua New Guinea, has not been a feature of Solomon Islands elections.

Candidate Numbers and Winner Vote Shares

In the typical electorate, elections are enthusiastically contested, with numerous candidates vying for voter support. The highest number of candidates to have stood in any election was 26 in the 2008 East Honiara by-election (the highest during a general election was 23 in Central Honiara in 2010). The median electorate (over all elections since independence) has had seven candidates standing in it.

Figure 2 shows the average number of candidates and average effective number of candidates (ENC, which can be thought of as an approximation of the number of competitive candidates)<sup>4</sup> standing in Solomon Islands general elections since independence. Two facts stand out. First, there was no significant overarching trend in candidate numbers between 1980 and 2001, although candidate numbers have increased considerably since 2001. Second, other than a very slight upturn since 2001, average ENC has not increased over time. Divergence between the number of candidates and the <sup>4</sup> Owing to the fact that not all candidates are equally competitive, absolute candidate counts may not accurately reflect the state of competition in any particular electorate. For example, an electorate where one candidate obtains 91 per cent of votes cast while the remaining nine candidates obtain only 1 per cent each is a very different electorate from one where 10 candidates each win 10 per cent of the vote. To account for this, political scientists typically report on electoral competition using a calculated figure, the ‘effective number of candidates’ (ENC) (or effective number of parties: ENP). The ENC is the reciprocal of the Herfindahl–Hirschman index of candidate vote shares in an electorate, and is calculated as 1 divided by the sum of all the candidate’s squared vote-shares. (Or, in equation form:  $1 / \sum_i^n v_i^2$  where  $n$  = the number of candidates and  $v_i$  = the vote share of the  $i$ th candidate). In my example electorate where one candidate obtains 91 per cent of the vote and the remaining 9 candidates obtain 1 per cent each the ENC is 1.21, close to one, reflecting the fact that only one candidate was competitive; in the electorate with 10 candidates each obtaining 10 per cent of the vote the ENC is 10, a reflection of the fact that all 10 were equally close to winning.

ENC suggests that while candidates have contested elections in increasing numbers since 2001, the number of candidates who have polled well has not risen.

Although Solomon Islanders are enthusiastic competitors in elections, success itself, either in the form of winning, or even merely winning a significant slice of electoral support, is hard to come by. Over the eight general elections Solomon Islands has had since independence, approximately 1,700 different people have stood as candidates. Of these only 196 have ever won. Figure 4 is a histogram based on the vote share of all candidates who stood in elections from 1980 until 2011. The X axis shows groupings of vote shares, the Y axis shows the number of candidates falling into that grouping. For example, the first bar on the left shows that more than 800 candidates have stood and won less than 5 per cent of the votes in their electorate. The steady fall in the height of the bars from left to right reflects the fact that most candidates in Solomon Islands elections win low vote shares. The plurality have won under 5 per cent of the votes cast in their electorate; the majority less than 10 per cent.

Women Candidates

The number of women candidates who have stood in national elections in Solomon Islands since 1980 is shown in Figure 5. Both the absolute number of candidates who were women and the percentage of all candidates who were women are shown.

Over the eight general elections Solomon Islands has held since independence, a total of 72 different women have stood in general elections (an additional three women stood in elections pre-independence). As Figure 5 shows, numbers of women candidates increased up until 2010, when there was a small decrease. Only two women — Hilda Kari and Vika Lusibaea — have won national-level elections in Solomon Islands since 1980.

Incumbent Turnover Rates

Tenure for those few candidates lucky enough to win is often short. Since the first post-independence election, on average nearly half (47 per cent) of those incumbent MPs who have defended their seats have lost them.<sup>5</sup> Figure 6 shows the percentage of incumbent MPs who contested and lost in general elections.

<sup>5</sup> On average, across all general elections since independence 91.4 per cent of MPs have defended their seats. Although comprehensive data do not exist explaining instances where MPs have not defended seats, instances for which there are data suggest voluntary retirement is far from the only cause. A number of MPs have died in office, and several have gone to prison while in office. And while death and imprisonment ought to trigger by-elections, when a general election is close the seat in question has often simply been held vacant until the general election. One cause of incumbent non-defence present in some other countries does not occur in Solomon Islands. Owing to the weakness of political parties in Solomon Islands (discussed more below), there is nothing akin to a party pre-selection process in Solomon Islands electorates. If an incumbent wishes to stand, and is alive and not prevented from doing so by problems with the law, they are able to.

Notes: the numerator in the calculation reflected in this graph is the number of incumbent MPs who contested and lost in each general election; the denominator is the number of incumbent MPs who contested.

As can be seen in Figure 6 there is variation between elections but no clear trend. Turnover rates were at their highest in the first post-independence election in 1980, but they were nearly as high again much more recently in 2001. The lowest levels of incumbent turnover occurred in 1993, an election which saw the introduction of a dedicated constituency development fund (paid for with Taiwanese aid) provided to sitting MPs, which they could spend, effectively at their own discretion, within their electorates (Fraenkel 2011).<sup>6</sup> Ostensibly this was meant to be a tool to assist development at the local level, yet it clearly has considerable use as a tool of patronage and, from that, is a potential source of electoral advantage. The number of electorates also rose from 38 to 47 in 1993, which meant that many sitting MPs found themselves defending smaller electorates. These two factors are the most likely causes of low turnover rates in 1993, with subsequent years seeing a return to equilibrium of sorts as aspiring challengers realised that smaller electorates meant fewer votes required to win. At the same time, voters worked out that largess in the form of constituency funds was not something solely the domain of the sitting MP and would likely flow, and possibly flow more, were that MP to be defeated.

<sup>6</sup> Something akin to these funds pre-dated 1993; however, previous funds were smaller and appeared to be less amenable to patronage spending.

Differences Between Electorates

Thus far the electoral statistics summarised have mostly taken the form of national averages or aggregates, yet buried within these country-level composites is considerable variation between electorates, as well as variation over time within individual electorates.

The lowest winning candidate vote share was that of Ben Foukona in Lau/Mbaelelea in 1984, who won with only 10.7 per cent of the vote. The highest winner vote share, setting aside the few instances where candidates have effectively won 100 per cent because they stood in uncontested elections, was that of Victor Ngele, who won 87 per cent of the vote in South Guadalcanal in 1993. In between these extremes, as the histogram illustrates, individual election wins have occurred across a very wide range of vote shares.

Focusing on the 2010 general election, Figure 8 is a scatterplot showing the number of candidates who stood and the percentage vote share of the winning candidate for each electorate. The red line on the chart is the (ordinary least squares) line of best fit. The two- or three-letter electorate codes are mapped to electorate names in the appendix.

Two aspects of the graph are interesting: first, there is a lot of variation both in the number of candidates standing and the votes won by the winning candidate; second, on average, electorates where there are more candidates are also the electorates where the winner wins with lower vote shares. It is much harder to win with a large vote share when you are contesting against numerous candidates. The winner in Central Honiara in 2010, where 23 candidates stood, achieved just under 15 per cent of the vote. In North New Georgia, on the other hand, there were only three candidates and the winner won nearly 74 per cent of all votes cast.

Interestingly, variance in candidate numbers or winning candidates' vote shares is not predominantly the product of between-province differences. It is true that, in terms of raw candidate numbers, the provinces of Malaita and Honiara have had more candidates standing in their electorates on average. But they also have electorates that contain, on average, more people, and this, rather than provincial culture, appears to be the main determinant of candidate numbers.

Differences Within Electorates Over Time

There is considerable variation in candidate numbers, effective numbers of candidates, and winning candidate vote shares within the same electorates over time. Figure 9 provides an example of this, plotting the number of candidates and the winning vote share over time for Central Guadalcanal electorate since independence. In 1997, eight candidates stood; by 2010 there were only two. In 1984 the winner won with less than 30 per cent of votes cast. In the 2009 by-election the winner won almost 60 per cent of the votes cast.

Members of Parliament

One aspect of electoral politics that is common to almost all electorates and which has remained unchanged over elections is the difference between the backgrounds of members of parliament and their constituents. Whereas around one-quarter of Solomon Islanders (26 per cent, as per 2009 census data) described themselves as employers or employees, all of the MPs in the 2010 parliament for whom researchers were able to obtain source data (49 out of 50) had worked in the formal economy before joining politics. Business backgrounds or employment in the civil service were the most common pre-parliamentary careers among MPs. Less frequent but still relatively common were MPs who had worked as teachers or school principals, and former provincial parliament MPs. Significantly, there were no subsistence farmers or people who made a living from selling produce at local markets serving as MPs in 2010. Even in 1980, while the makeup of parliament was different (civil servants formed a much higher share; private sector workers a much lower share), all or almost all members of parliament had worked in the formal economy before entering parliament (Corbett and Wood 2013, p. 327).

Similarly, according to the 2009 census, only 23.3 per cent of Solomon Islanders aged over 12 years had had some secondary education (Solomon Islands National Statistics Office 2012, p. 2). Yet, of those MPs in the 2010 parliament for whom we were able to obtain information (46 out of 50) 91.3 per cent had received some secondary education. Forty-five per cent of MPs in the 2010 parliament had undertaken tertiary study, compared to only 4.4 per cent of Solomon Islanders aged over 12 (Corbett and Wood 2013, p. 325).

While MPs tend to come into their roles with the benefit of higher than average levels of education, and experience either as civil servants or working in the private sector, owing to the high incumbent turnover rates, the number of MPs who have political experience born of long stays in parliament is quite low. Figure 10 shows the composition of post-independence Solomon Islands parliaments broken down by the proportion of serving MPs' length of parliamentary tenure.

On average across all parliaments since independence, almost half (49 per cent) of MPs have been first-term MPs and over three-quarters (76 per cent) have been either first- or second-term MPs. In 2010, 84 per cent of MPs were serving either their first or second term in parliament.

Data Notes General Elections

Data are from the following sources:

2010 the Solomon Islands Gazette

2006 the Solomon Islands Gazette

2001 the Solomon Star Newspaper (Monday 10 December 2001)

1997 the Solomon Nius (August 1997)

1993 the Solomon Islands Gazette

1989 the Solomon Islands Gazette

1984 the Solomon Islands Gazette

1980 Newspaper reporting (the name of the paper the results copy is taken from is not clear)

1976 the Solomon Islands Gazette

1973 the Solomon Islands Gazette

1970 the Solomon Islands Gazette

1967 the Solomon Islands Gazette

Spelling is not standardised in Solomon Islands. To allow for comparisons across time, names of candidates have been standardised. This was done carefully, but could potentially have introduced errors. Original names, spelt as reported in the source data, can be found in the data files which accompany this report on the CDI's website.

Minor redistricting occurred in 1997. Significant redistricting occurred in 1993. There was also some redistricting pre-1976.

A map of electorates (as they have been since 1997) is in the appendices of this document.

A table mapping pre-1997 (and pre 1993) electorates to current electorates can be downloaded from: <http://wp.me/aSqRs-zC>. Mapping for pre-1976 redistricting is not available.

Data in the following tables has been reconciled to source data. However, there may be errors in the source data. There is one error which I am aware of. These are the results for Joseph Wane in the electorate of small Malaita in 2010. Here they are reported as per the gazette; however, polling station data and interviews suggest he won 544 votes not 13.
